Judith looked out over the four acres of green grass; at the children moving, criss-crossing the soccer fields; at the sudden crash of bodies and the referee in the black knit shirt with the white V-neck collar, standing over the two boys tangled on the ground. He paused, wrote something on a pad of paper, and raised his hand to the sky, a yellow card at his fingertips. She tried to remember. Yellow was a foul. It was red that got you ejected from the game. From the other side of the field several parents let loose a barrage of verbal assaults on the referee; from the home team coach came a polite but audible Thank you ref. It was a different sport, soccer. No hitting from behind. No scissor kicks to the ankles. It was a plenty physical game, but you didnt hurt people - at least, not intentionally. Ref. . . sub, the coach yelled. The linesman raised his red and black checkered flag to draw the referees attention to the request and a sweating, panting boy raced to the sideline as another took his place. The coach, an island of calm in a torrent of emotion, turned to the exhausted youth and putting his arm solidly around his shoulder, bent to whisper in his ear, firmly admonishing, Youre too nice. You cant be nice like that, son. Hell run right over you to the goal and youll be flat on your back. You dont have to hurt him or knock him over, but youve got to stop him. Next time pull his shirt. Come up close. Next to him. As he talked he demonstrated by...
